

SECOND SUNDAY OF EASTER:

IMMIGRATION

HAVE MERCY ON THE IMMIGRANT

What does it mean to be resurrected people? It means to have mercy, divine mercy for all God's creation, including the immigrant.

Below, for Divine Mercy Sunday, we hear Br. John Paul Peterson, O.P. preaching: Have Mercy on the Immigrant. To the right is a video by Pope Francis, "Migrants and Refugees."

TEXT OF THE PREACHING:

The Second Sunday of Easter (or Divine Mercy Sunday)

A reading from the Gospel of John, Chapter 20:19-31

Theme: Mercy, a means of conversion.

Today we celebrate the Second Sunday of Easter or Mercy Sunday, in which the Lord after his resurrection showed himself to his disciples. Getting into the gospel reading allows us to see how the word of God can inform our attitude of Faith, Hope and Mercy for others and ourselves.

When Jesus appeared to the disciples, He said to them, "Peace be with you." When he had said this, he showed them his hands and his side. The disciples rejoiced when they saw the Lord. Jesus said to them again, "Peace be with you. As the Father has sent me, so I send you." Thomas, one of the Twelve, was not with them when Jesus came.

When Thomas did arrive, the other disciples said to him, "We have seen the Lord." But he said to them, "Unless I see the mark of the nails in his hands and put my finger into the nail marks and put my hand into his side, I will not believe." At this news, Thomas did not have an attitude of openness to the possibility that the Christ had risen. When Jesus came the second time, he stood in their midst and said, "Peace be with you." Looking to Thomas, Jesus said, "Put your finger here and see my hands, and bring your hand and put it into my side, and do not be unbelieving, but believe." Thomas was discovering the mercy of God in flesh and blood before him.

The story of Thomas is intriguing in that Christ did not abandon Thomas for his lack of faith and hope. Instead, Jesus showed Thomas mercy. This merciful love of Jesus invited Thomas to a deeper conversion, which is the most concrete expression of the presence of mercy. The measure of God's mercy, it seems, is only limited by our unwillingness to show mercy to others. This brings us to the core mercy values of our Christian Catholic faith which I like to identify as dignity, respect, integrity, justice, compassion, accompaniment.

Today we celebrate Divine Mercy Sunday, a day in which we remember the mercy of God to all of us. How do we show mercy to the immigrant? When it comes to immigration mercy matters: It matters because we all need compassion. Mercy also matters because it is what can join us together despite our differences so that we can share equally so that each has enough. Many in this country today are two, three or perhaps six generations removed from those of our ancestors. We are the heirs of their trials and risks and sacrifices. We are obligated to give thoughtful discernment to today's challenges. The laws of our nation must be respected. Yet we are a country like no other and offer opportunities and freedoms granted to us by God, who only asks for our love in return.

And so we ask, how do we experience and show mercy to the stranger in our midst, especially the immigrant? The USCCB text on immigration, "Welcome the Stranger among US," challenges us to look at the common good of all persons, with their inherent dignity as Children of God. There are different reasons why people come to the US. I voluntarily came to the US, not to seek a better life but to explore religious life. However, some came seeking a better life due to challenges in their homeland.

Nonetheless, in the call for us, perhaps most significantly for Christians, Jesus shows us what it means to be merciful: to the sick, the orphan, the widow and the stranger.

Unity in diversity is firmly grounded in the Church's social teaching, particularly in Justice and Peace. Understanding Catholic social teaching helps us to put our faith into action, giving us the opportunities to better understand and practice what our faith teaches.

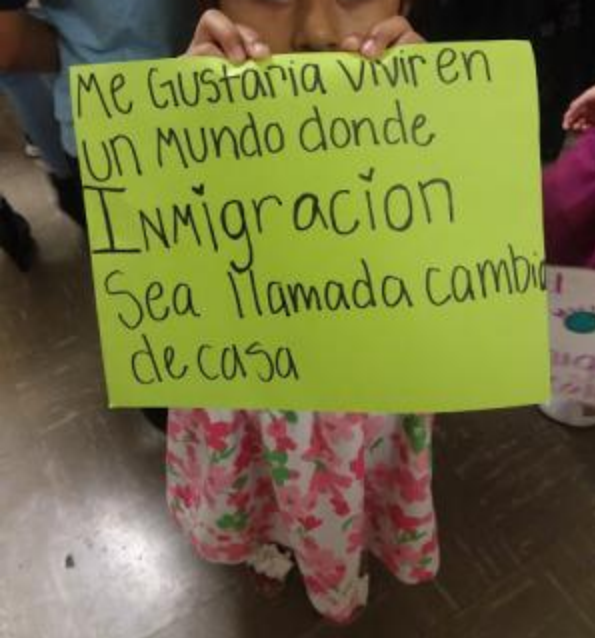

Christ ceaselessly calls us, through the work of the Church, to help those who have been forced out of their homeland due to war, civil unrest, and natural disaster. As you see immigrants today, what core mercy values draw you or me to work and minister to the immigrant, is it the dignity of the person, respect for their personhood, justice, service, compassion, and accompaniment? Although I am a nonimmigrant, as a religious missionary to the US, in the service of a religious function, and working with immigrants from other countries, I saw first-hand the suffering immigrants' experience, from the lack of food, adequate shelter and resources needed to live adequately. Immigrants always face the challenges of cultural differences of language, food customs, and behaviors. They feel unwelcome, and an attitude and behavior of indifference makes it difficult for immigrants to share their experiences. This forces me to work harder for their well-being and a successful outcome.

For consideration, we can ask what are our Mercy Value(s) when working with immigrants? When I take the time to learn and understand the stories of the immigrants and refugees that I work with, I am practicing compassion. When I advocate for the rights of all people to live in this country regardless of origin, race and socioeconomic status just like the many European immigrants who came before, I am practicing compassion and service to others. I acknowledge that just like my ancestors were shown compassion, I need to do the same. I am understanding personal responsibility. I encourage others to take the time to learn more about immigration by talking to immigrants themselves and accompanying them on their journey to wholeness and wellness. Get involved, volunteer, ask questions, be compassionate, and most of all put a human face to the debate. Be merciful by walking in the shoes of immigrants and try to understand their struggles and challenges. Mercy values drive me to walk with the stranger. "If you want peace, work for justice."

TERMS:

"Immigrant" is not a term used universally: though common in North America to refer to those living in a country other than their birth country, other terms frequently used include "international migrant," the "foreign-born," and "migrant." National statistical agencies base their counts of migrant populations on the number of people who say they were born in another country and/or who hold the citizenship of another country. In casual usage, "immigrant" can refer to any foreign-born person, but in the United States, some are technically considered "nonimmigrants." While immigrants intend to stay in a new country permanently, nonimmigrants remain only temporarily, whether that's for a few days on a business trip, a few months as a seasonal worker, or a few years as a student, missionary, or religious work. Those considered immigrants also include a range of people with different legal statuses. These statuses are not identical, but are often comparable, across different receiving countries.

FIVE PRINCIPLES OF TEACHING

1. Persons have the right to life.
2. Persons have the right to form families.
3. Sovereign nations have the right to life at the expense of migrants.
4. Refugees and asylum seekers have the right to life.
5. The human dignity of all persons should be respected.

SCRIPTURE APPLICATION

Leviticus 19:33-34

If a stranger lives with you in your land, do not oppress him as one of your own countrymen; you shall love him as one of your own, for you were once strangers yourselves in the land of Egypt.

Isaiah 10: 1-2

Woe to the legislators of iniquity, who draw up decrees, who refuse justice to the poor, who oppress the people of their rights, who say, "We will not see, we will not hear, we will not touch, we will not feel, we will not know."

Jeremiah 22: 3

Yahweh says this: Practice justice and righteousness, and I will dwell with you, says the Lord. Do not oppress the orphan, the widow; do not shed innocent blood.

Matthew 25: 35-40

For I was hungry and you gave me food to eat; I was thirsty and you gave me drink; I was stranger and you welcomed me; I was naked and you clothed me; I was sick and you visited me; inasmuch as you did it to one of the least of these my brethren, you did it to me.

Galatians 3:28

...there are no more distinctions between Jew and Greek, slave and free, male and female, but all of you are one in Christ Jesus.

CHURCH STATEMENT

Pacem in Terris (Pope John XXIII, 1963)

Every human being has the right to live within the confines of his own country. If, for it, he must be permitted to leave his residence there. The fact that he is not to deprive him of membership in the universal society, the common good. It is not irrelevant to draw the conclusion that refugees are persons and not objects. Refugees cannot lose their rights of citizenship of their own state. Among man's personal rights is the right which he hopes to be able to exercise for his dependents. It is therefore the duty of the state – so far as the good of the community is concerned – to further the aims of those who are in need of the society. [106]

Gaudium et Spes (Second Vatican Council, 1965)

When workers come from other countries for the economic advancement of their own country, as regards wages and working conditions, the people, moreover, above all, must not be mere tools of production but must be able to live with their families to live with them. The state must also see to it that the interests of the country or region to which they come are not harmed. Laborem Exercens (Pope John Paul II, 1981)

The person working away from his home, whether emigrant or a seasonal worker, must be compared with the other workers in the society. Rights. Emigration in search of work must be for financial or social exploitation. The same criteria should be applied to the emigrant in the society concerned. The state must be standard and not according to the needs of the [23.2]

Strangers No Longer: Together on the Journey (Jan. 22, 2003)

We stand in solidarity with you, our migrant brothers and sisters, and we will continue to advocate on your behalf for just and fair migration policies. We commit ourselves to animate communities of Christ's disciples on both sides of the border to accompany you on your journey so that yours will truly be a journey of hope, not of despair, and so that, at the point of arrival, you will experience that you are strangers no longer and instead members of God's household. We pray that, wherever you go, you will always be conscious of your dignity as human beings and of your call to bring the Good News of Jesus Christ, who came that we "might have life and have it more abundantly" (Jn 10:10). We invite you who are forced to emigrate to maintain contact with your homes and, especially, to maintain fidelity to your families so that you treasure your cultural values and the gift of faith and so that you bring these treasures to whatever place you go. Address to the Participants in the Plenary of the Pontifical Council for the Pastoral Care of Migrants and Itinerant People (Pope Francis, May 24, 2013)

"The Church is Mother, and her motherly attention is expressed with special tenderness and closeness to those who are obliged to flee their own country and exist between rootlessness and integration. This tension destroys people. Christian compassion—this 'suffering with' compassion—is expressed first of all in the commitment to obtain knowledge of the events that force people to leave their homeland, and where necessary, to give voice to those who cannot manage to make their cry of distress and oppression heard. They are all elements that dehumanize and must push every Christian and the whole community to concrete attention."

Address to Joint Session of Congress, Washington, D.C. (Pope Francis, September 24, 2015)

"Let us remember the golden rule: do unto others as you would have them do unto you."

"Let us treat other with the same passion and compassion with which we want to be treated."

"We, the people of this continent, are not fearful of foreigners, because most of us were once foreigners."

"If we want security, let us give security. If we want life, let us give life. If we want opportunity, let us provide these opportunities."

Interview at the U.S./Mexico border (Pope Francis, Feb 18, 2016)

"A person who thinks only about building walls, wherever they may be, and not building bridges, is not Christian. This is not the gospel," the Pope told journalists who asked his opinion on Trump's proposals to halt illegal immigration.
